VI- Reading Comprehension (110 Marks)

110

Read the following passage carefully, then answer the questions that follow:

In the past, sailors travelled for months at a time. They faced many dangers, including a disease called scurvy. Scurvy caused terrible suffering. It damaged skin and made black spots. Cuts did not recover and blood started to come out from gums. Teeth fell out. The senses were affected, too, with strange smells and imaginary sights. Death was a common result at the end.

In 1747, James Lind was serving as a ship's doctor in the British Navy. He was familiar with the effects of scurvy. The disease took more lives than wars with the enemy! There were different ideas about how to treat scurvy. Lind decided to test several methods.

Lind selected twelve men with similar cases of scurvy. He grouped them into six pairs and gave each group the same treatment for six days. A group drank apple juice. A group drank vinegar. Another group drank seawater. The fourth group used a liquid containing certain chemicals. Group five ate certain spices. The last one ate oranges and lemons.

Only one of the treatments worked! The men who ate the oranges and lemons had "sudden and good effects," according to Lind. He did not know the reason why fruits cured the disease. But he recommended changing the diet of sailors to include fresh fruits. His recommendations were largely neglected. Not until 1795 did the British Navy issue an order to carry lime juice on board. As a result, scurvy became much less common.

Still, there was an argument about why lime juice was effective. Then, in the 1920s, a Hungarian scientist made a great discovery. Albert Szent-Györgyi was studying chemical changes in body cells. He identified a substance that could slow down damage of body cells. It would later be vitamin C. Because of his discovery, Györgyi received a Nobel Prize.

Vitamin C is found in citrus fruits, like oranges and lemons. It is also found in foods such as berries, broccoli, and tomatoes. The human body requires vitamin C for the health of body cells. Without it, gums would bleed and wounds can't be recovered. Tissues that support the bones fail. In scurvy, the body is badly affected in many ways. And the cause is clear-a lack of vitamin C in the diet.

A) From a, b, c and d, choose the correct answer: (5x10=50 Marks)
