VI- Reading Comprehension (110 Marks)

110

Read the following passage carefully, then answer the questions that follow:

The desire to live longer, healthier lives has fascinated people for centuries. With advancements in medicine and lifestyle choices, the average age of people continues to increase. This phenomenon is known as longevity (long life). It is the ability to live for a period longer than the average person. Many people believe that longevity can only have positive outcomes. However, along with the benefits of longevity come some concerns about its results.

The goal of living a long life involves things like access to healthcare, lifestyle choices, and genetics. Regular physical activities, a well-balanced diet, stress management and staying away from overeating habits and smoking are proven to extend people's lives and improve their health. For example, people in Okinawa, Japan and Sardinia, Italy, have people living past the age of 100. This is believed to be because of their diet and lifestyle. Longevity and well-being also greatly increased by maintaining a healthy routine, doing beneficial activities, and building strong social networks.

Some people think that living longer is important because it means we get more time to enjoy life's moments, reach our goals, and share experiences with their loved ones. It allows us to pursue our interests and passions, strengthen our bonds with family and friends, and achieve our dreams. For example, many people started doing the things that they loved at their 50s and 60s. This is because, when younger, they spent most of their time working and trying to make more money. Additionally, advancements in medicine and technology offer the possibility of enjoying a better quality of life, as we get older, allowing us to stay engaged and active. On the other hand, some people might have worries about living longer due to possible issues like increased healthcare costs, stress and overpopulation. Additionally, they might worry about the quality of life in old age, including health problems, loneliness, and dependence on others.

In conclusion, the goal of longevity presents both opportunities and challenges. It is important to consider the moral and social results of living longer while aiming to improve the quality of life in old age. A balanced approach is needed to ensure that longer life is welcomed as a positive outcome.
