VI. Reading Comprehension (110 Marks)

110

Running a restaurant is much more than simply preparing food. It is like managing a small community where every role is essential. Every meal begins long before it reaches the customer's table. Ingredients must be carefully selected, stored, and prepared before serving. Fresh vegetables are washed, peeled, and chopped, while different meats and seafood are cleaned and seasoned according to each recipe. Sauces, food decorations, and desserts often require strict timing and meticulous techniques. Planning is important because some dishes take longer to cook than others and cooking many meals at once requires careful management to ensure that they are ready at the right moment.

In the kitchen, teamwork is vital. The head chef runs the entire operation and gives the assistant chefs, helping cooks, and workers all of the necessary directions. Each person has a clear role: some focus on cutting and preparing ingredients, others on cooking or preparing the plates for the customers. Some staff keep their eyes on the time to make sure that all the ordered dishes for a table arrive together. Communication between the kitchen and serving staff is equally important. Waiters must know which dishes are ready, how long each will take, and whether any special requests or changes are needed. Miscommunication can easily cause late dishes or mistakes, which can affect the customer's time at the restaurant.

Beyond the kitchen, many other staff members have a necessary role in a restaurant's smooth operation. Dishwashers maintain cleanliness and organisation, managers handle schedules, fresh food orders, and customer needs. Also, the restaurant hosts make sure that guests are welcomed and seated quickly. Restaurant suppliers and delivery workers also play an important role, delivering fresh high-quality ingredients on time. Even small tasks done by staff members, like arranging tables, refilling drinks, or keeping menus clean, affect the overall atmosphere.

When all these elements work together, the result is an enjoyable dining experience. A restaurant is successful not only because of delicious food, but also because of careful organisation, cooperation, teamwork, and attention to detail. Every role, from the dishwasher to the head chef, has a part in transforming raw ingredients into a memorable meal. For customers, it may look effortless, but behind each dish is a complex system, necessary skills, and dedication that make dining out a truly pleasant experience.
